

This map overlays recent spatial data of the city's buildings on top of the same historic 1902 map. The juxtaposition provides another visualization of how Reykjavik has developed outward over the past century, as indicated by the buildings creeping beyond the frame of the map. It's fascinating to see how the streets that have existed since 1902 feature much more density with their buildings, as opposed to the spread that is noticeable with the later development featured beyond the edges of the bottom of the map.
